

Agency Services Department, told homeowners about a couple of grants they may be able to use, but it would take at least two years before everything could be finalized. "That is if everything is picture perfect," he said.

Landowner Kevin Benson said, "I don't think we have two years." Benson said "no one in his right mind" would buy his cabin in its current condition.

He moved into the subdivision in 2004, and by 2009 his cabin was sitting on blocks waiting to be moved up the hill because the ground was shifting so much it was unsafe.

Jim Dwyer, whose sun porch is pulling away from a twisted deck on his house, said he's moved his house up the hill once.

"We're just praying for a tornado,"

Shelly Nelson of Litchville, left, who owns a home in Lee's Subdivision, speaks to officials at Monday's meeting.

Dwyer said to the amusement of those at the meeting. Dwyer said his homeowner's insurance won't pay for the problem, but it would if a tornado struck.

Morrell said if county commissioners were able to use the federal Predisaster Mitigation Grant Program for grants, 75 percent of the costs would be paid by the federal government and 25 percent locally. Commissioner Rodger Berntson said homeowners would have to pay that 25 percent.

If the PDM program were approved, the federal government would take action to permanently reduce or eliminate the effects of future disasters.

After the meeting, Morrell said if commissioners use the grant program to acquire property, the county would have relocate or acquire the homes.

Schwehr appointed Kim Franklin, Barnes County Emergency Management director, to be a liaison between the commissioners and the landowners to keep a dialogue going.

Lois Bjornson, president of the Rebel's Ridge Association, made up of landowners in Lee's Subdivision, said someone, maybe the county zoning board, should have done an analysis of the area before there was any development there.

Shelly Nelson of Litchville, who has property in the subdivision, said an engineer she hired to look at her property simply said it's underground saturation.

"It's going fast," Nelson said about the problem whose cause no one seems to want to pinpoint. "You can try different things, but no one wants to sign on the dotted line.

"I don't even want to go out there."

'Chiclone' buffets Illinois; tornado watch issued

Associated Press

CHICAGO — Strong wind and torrential rain buffeted the Midwest Tuesday as forecasters predicted the giant storm could be the most powerful to hit Illinois in over seven decades.

The massive storm muscled its way across an area that stretched from the Dakotas to the eastern Great Lakes. Severe thunderstorm warnings blanketed much of the Midwest, and tornado warnings were issued from Arkansas to southern Illinois. Flights were canceled at O'Hare International Airport, the Midwestern hub.

Commuters in the Chicago area faced blustery, wind-driven rain as they waited for trains to take them downtown before dawn. Some huddled underneath train overpasses to stay out of the gusts, dashing to the platform at the last minute.

Anthony Quit, a 24-year-old jewelry store worker in Chicago, said the wind rendered umbrellas virtually useless and that driving was hazardous.

"The wind was almost blowing horizontally. The rain was slapping me in the face," Quit said. "My umbrella shot off ... It was pretty dangerous."

He said the wind was so strong that his car "was starting to veer off the road."

Another commuter described a frightening pre-dawn drive to the train station.

"It was raining really, really hard. Coming down the street I was kind of getting really nervous; even with the bright lights you couldn't see in front of you," said Delphine Thompson, 53, a telecom manager in Chicago.

The weather service said gusts that topped 50 miles per hour slammed into the Chicago suburb of Lombard early Tuesday. Weather Service Meteorologist Jim Allsopp said the storm could be one of the strongest to hit Illinois in more than 70 years.

High winds forced authorities to stop flights at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago.

A spokeswoman for the Chicago Department of Aviation said officials have issued a temporary "ground stop" at O'Hare, meaning no flights are departing.

Aviation Department spokeswoman Karen Pride said more than 125 flights were canceled at O'Hare. No cancellations are being reported at Midway International Airport on Chicago's South Side.

The storm was also picking up speed on Twitter, where people were dubbing it "Chiclone" and "Windpocalypse."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch reported that the storm toppled part of a building in south St. Louis, with bricks and rubble from the roof and facade toppling onto the street. No injuries were reported, and the building's structural integrity was being examined.

In Milwaukee, some restaurants moved sidewalk furniture indoors as the storm approached and homeowners scrambled to batten down anything that might be swept away by the storm.

Forecasters said strong gusts could be expected through the day.

"We're expecting sustained winds on the order of 35 to 40 mph with gusts up to 60 mph throughout the afternoon," said Edward Felon, a meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Romeoville, Ill. He said the storm's central pressure is equivalent to a Category 3 hurricane.

The storm is one of the strongest to hit the Midwest in decades, Felon said.

"This is a very different type of event," he said. "But that does give an indication of the magnitude of the winds. This isn't something you see even every year."

He said the winds will subside Tuesday evening but could pick up again on Wednesday.

Eleven states are under a high wind warning. Those states are: Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Minnesota, Ohio and parts of Kentucky.

Strong winds have blanketed the Northern Plains, with heavy snow not far behind.
