stories and animations.

"It was closer to the end of the year," fourth-grader Kai Nellermoe said. "With all the books, we could remember what all of them were about and what our math lessons were about."

Like the fourth-grade class, the pre-calculus students were surprised at the results.

"When you're working on it, you don't really visualize it as being that good, but our hard work paid off," eleventh-grader Stephen Appel said.

When it came to the technical side of things, computer and business teacher Brook Spaulding helped coordinate illustrations and publishing.

Julie Militzera's fourth-grade class at Park Christian School gathers behind one of the books created by Amy Rogness' pre-calculus class to reinforce geometry concepts for them.

"I came in when the kids had written their stories and they had begun their illustrations," Spaulding said. "I came in to show them how to turn their on-paper illustrations to digital illustrations."

To publish the books, Spaulding sent them to Blurb.com, a website that specializes in self-publishing.

The length of the project wasn't the only challenge.

Pre-calculus student Dirk Jasperse said the process required a lot of trial and error.

"Problem solving and being able to work as a group was part of it, and making sure we're doing the best for our own sense of satisfaction and for the kids," Jasperse said.

Spaulding said no challenges were insurmountable, but were rather a learning experience for all involved.

"These are technologies they don't use on a regular basis in their learning, so it was really fun to show them," Spaulding said, referring to the use of Adobe Photoshop.

For the teachers involved, a major benefit was having the different age groups work together.

"I love seeing older kids interacting with younger kids," Rogness said. "That's a benefit that we have here — that we're all in one school — so they get to do that and it's such a positive interaction."

Two Minn., men sentenced for poaching and marijuana

By SARAH SMITH

FORUM COMMUNICATIONS CO.

Two Twin Cities area men received electronic home monitoring Monday as punishment in a Hubbard County case that involved poaching deer and growing marijuana on leased hunting land.

Stephen Battin, 61, of Big Lake, and Donald Cook, 61, of Bloomington, entered into plea deals in April that substantially reduced the crimes they were facing and the time they could have spent behind bars.

Battin pled guilty in April to a Third Degree Controlled Substance Crime, for which he will serve 75 days of EHM and five years of probation. He also pled guilty to a charge of hunter harassment, a misdemeanor, for which he received a $1,000 fine and 90 days in jail, stayed one year. Although his attorney Larry Kimball asked Judge Paul Rasmussen not to impose a firearms ban on his client, the judge barred Battin from any weapons possession for the full duration of the probation.

Kimball said the arrests were under "unusual circumstances. He hopes to continue hunting at sometime," Kimball said of Battin, who declined to speak at his sentencing.

Battin is banned from having any controlled substances and must submit to random testing during his probation.

Cook pleaded guilty to the illegal taking of a deer, a gross misdemeanor. He received two years probation, during which he will lose his hunting privileges and a $135 fine.

"I'm sorry for the mistake I made," Cook told the judge. "I appreciate the opportunity" the plea deals gave the disabled vets.

Both men are considered 100 percent disabled veterans, suffering from Post Traumatic Stress Syndrome caused by their service in Vietnam. Those disabilities figured heavily into their penalties.

Battin and Cook were arrested last fall after DNR Conservation Officers conducted a flyover near Badoura State Forest just before deer season last fall on a tip that hunters in the vicinity were baiting deer.

Battin had leased hunting land there. He lost his lease after the arrests.

In the process of the investigation, DNR officers discovered 42 pounds of marijuana growing on the property.

Charges of Transporting Illegal Big Game and shooting a deer out of season were dismissed in Battin's plea agreement.

Cook pled to the Transporting charge. The drug charge against him was dismissed.

Hubbard County Attorney Don Dearstyne said Battin resolved the civil case against him after the criminal matters were taken care of.

The two ATVs on the property were confiscated as a result of the investigation. Battin paid $5,000 to get them back.

The drug task force involved in the pot bust will get 70 percent of the proceeds from one ATV. The DNR gets the entire $2,500 from the second ATV, Dearstyne said. His office recoups 20 percent of the cost of prosecuting the case from the sale of the first ATV.

North Dakota gardeners are being asked to donate to food bank

By AMY DALRYMPLE

FORUM COMMUNICATIONS CO.

FARGO — North Dakota's green thumbs can do their part to eliminate hunger.

The Hunger Free North Dakota Garden project is asking gardeners to plant extra vegetables to donate to the Great Plains Food Bank.

The second annual project kicked off Wednesday and is aiming to get 100,000 pounds of produce donated.

Doug Goehring, North Dakota agriculture commissioner, said last year more than 12 people in the state sought emergency food assistance, and 40 percent of them needing help were children.

"In a state that produces so much food, it is sad to say that hunger is very much a problem here," Goehring said.

Gardeners or organizations can plant an extra row or an extra acre of plants and donate produce to be distributed to food pantries, soup kitchens, senior programs and other charities around the state.

Linda Sailer, product resource manager for the Great Plains Food Bank, said the project needs donations both large and small.

"Whether I'm growing a tomato plant on my patio or I'm growing a field or acres of corn and potatoes, it allows me to get involved," Sailer said.

So far, 58 organizations are lined up.

Among them is TNT Kids Fitness of Fargo, which involved students last year to grow produce that was donated to Great Plains Food Bank and the Nate Hendrickson, kids fitness and special needs director at TNT, said the kids enjoy the project.

"It's a good way for the kids to be outside," Hendrickson said. "They get to watch the things grow and they get to see the end product."

Last year, the project collected $361,500 pounds of produce.
